********* Short Story of the Day.

HOODOO OR MASCOT.

Elizabeth Harlow, in Boston Post. "Where was yer to-day, Bill?"

"Laid off for a rest." The latter speaker was a tall, lank, rawboned specimen, with a Grecian nose of noble dimensions. The person who sat opposite him at the table in the cheap restaurant where they were taking their evening meal, and who next spoke, might have been his reflection in a glass.

"If I had Bill's luck I'd lay off for half a year."

"What's happened now, Joe?" asked one

"What's happened now, Joe?" asked one of the two other occupants of the table.

"Struck the China lottery to-day for a hundred 'n seventy dollars."

"That so, Bill? Well, I'll be hanged."

"Tell yer what I've known Bill to do," said Joe in a tone of mingled pride and pessimism. "I've seen him fall into the river and come out dry as a bone, with his pockets full of fish."

"Yes," drawled Bill, in the tone of one receiving homage due, "an' Joe put the fish in the kettle ter boll, and left them so long they all boiled to glue and spiled the kettle."

receiving homage due, "an' Joe put the fish in the kettle ter boil, and left them so long they all boiled to glue and spiled the kettle."

Only a feeble laugh saluted these passes, as all the hearers knew the proverbial good luck of Bill, and the equally certain ill luck of his twin brother Joe. So unvarying were these characteristics in the two brothers that Bill always spoke of Joe, in his absence, as the hoodoo, and Joe called Bill the mascot, and they were pretty generally known by these terms. Joe's lil luck made him simulate a tone of pessimism in his conversation, while Bill's confidence in his luck was the height of optimism. Of course, this was more often assumed than real, for both had a keen sense of humor and delighted to exaggerate their own quallities. Still, years of following out this plan could not help but make an impression on them. It was perhaps more so with Bill than with his brother, for he had almost grown to believe that fortune could never fail him, but he would never have forgiven you if he had discovered that you thought he looked with pity at times on his less favored brother. Underlying all this talk and twitting of one another was a deep affection between the two.

The brothers were day laborers, in the fullest sense of the California term, turning their hands to whatever afforded employment—at present, carpenters.

There existed in each of them a fondness for a certain little dressmaker who lived across the street from their lodgings. This fondness was the one subject the brothers never discussed. The marriage question, though, was a well worn theme, and both agreed that a bachelor of 38 was a fool to throw up his life and independence and bind himself to the cares and drudging of a man of family. Their fellow workmen, knowing well their views on this subject, used to twit Joe about Bill's attentions to the little dressmaker and vice verst, but the only result would be a gruff, "Bill's a fool," or "Joe's an ass."

It would appear that Bill, in the confidence born of his title to night.

Joe did not show up that day nor the next, and the boys, wishing to get some particulars of the result of the double courting, approached Bill with, "Well, what luck'd hoodoo have with the dress-

"Spose you'll invite us to your wedding

then?"
"Wedding be hanged."
"Why, what's the matter? She didn't throw you over, too, did she?"
"Don't s'pose I'm such a darned idiot as to go'n get married, too, do yer? Guess I've got more sense'n that fool Joe."
The boys had sense enough to shut up at once, but in spite of his carriage they felt that the spell of the mascot was brokfor the boys say Joe never forgave his wife for refusing Bill.
